Number Fifty Eight
August 16, 1975

CLAW & FANG is published by Don Horton, 16 Jordan Ct., Sacramento, Calif 95826
Tele: (916) 383-4848. Printed on the 1st and 16th of every month, usually (see below). Subscription rate is 12 issues for $3.00--add 35¢ for airmail and $1.00 for overseas surface mail. Sample copy 25¢. Game fee is $2.00 plus a subscription. CLAW & FANG is a division of R & D COMMUNICATIONS. Diplomacy is a registered trademark of Games Research, Inc.

This issue is dedicated to the La Brea Tar Pits where many a claw and fang met their demise. While at nearby Holmby Park.....well, we shall see!

1. As mentioned in the last issue, Helpmate and I are off for Europe (France and Spain) next month. The next CLAW & FANG is due on September 6 and then not until November 1.

2. That unfortunate handful of you out there that receive POICTESME, the unpronounceable gamezine put out by Bruce Schlickbernd, saw an article in the latest issue entitled "The Fangmaster in France" and spuriously attributed to me. True aficionados of the "Adventures of Fangmaster" series would recognize it as a fake in a second. As you all know, the real Fangmaster articles are fact, not fiction. I write about things that really happen to me. While they naturally come out funny they are, nevertheless true. But this one.....

Near the beginning, for example, it says: "Wandering along a street marked Rue de Remaik, I sought out havens for epicureans of my status. My canines were brushed a gleaming white for the hunt, and my molars were vainly trying to bribe my bicuspidis for their advance position. Spotting one restaraunt (sic), I stealthily (sic) skulked in and purloined a stray spoon: no grease--the coast was clear. Five hours, 13 courses, and $159 dollars later, I called the head waiter over to my table. 'My good man, that was a most excellent appetizer. Now, can you tell me where I can get some real food?'" (sick)

After this the story became implausible. I was allegedly captured by a talking ivy plant, imprisoned in a dungeon for several weeks and then tried for breaking diet laws, and....well, the ending is too horrible to contemplate.

Anyhow, I want you all to know if was a forgery. The real Fangmaster in France series will not appear until I return from France in October.

3. This animosity between Schlickbernd (sic) and myself dates back to last year's Original Dinkicon when he stabbed me in the Master's Game and he has never forgiven me. For the next episode I suggest you attend this year's version, Sunday August 24. The blood letting starts at 10:00 am with the Master's Game at 1:00 pm. (I should qualify since on the last TDA printout I was listed as one of the top 20 players.)

The Original Dinkicon II will be held at Holmby Park again. Lunch will be $1.50 but must be reserved in advance. Phone or write Peter Shamray, 10614 LeConte Ave, Los Angeles 90024. Telephone: (213) 474-6121

SOME ADDITIONAL NOTES TO "BALANCE OF POWER"

by Eric Verheiden

After reading Edi's rebuttal to a single sentence of my previous article, about all I can say is that of the three games he mentioned, Edi is credited with wins in two (the concession to Margaret Gemignani is of course unratable) and a two-way draw in the third, and let readers draw their own conclusions.

In fairness, I will say that Edi does try to be unpredictable at times, as when he makes a "holy alliance" which supposedly he will not break. In the game I had with him in which I ran into one of those, he did indeed keep it to the end, though it was definitely in his interest to do so as I would have won otherwise.

Further, Edi is not, in my opinion, the worst (or best, depending on how you want to look at it) stabber in the hobby. That honor goes to none other than Walter Buchanan. He won six games in a row, all more or less in the same fashion: a succession of very effective betrayals of ally after ally, aided and abetted by very effective diplomacy which enabled him to keep his ill-gotten gains until it was time for the next stab.

Walt did have a few other things going for him. He entered a number of games at roughly the same time, all of which he later won. Consequently, by the time it became apparent that Walt was an effective and dangerous opponent, it was too late for the other players to do anything about it.

As of late, Walt has had somewhat less spectacular success (most particularly in CLAW & FANG's 1973EJ, his first loss) and has gone mainly to playing in Demo games as a result.

As for other well-known figures in the hobby, I would have given Mike Rocamora (something like 6 wins in 8 games to his credit; winner of the FTF tournament at the last Dipcon) second place in the stab category, but now I am not so sure. His conservative play in the ongoing 1975A is not like the Mike Rocamora I came to know and... well, came to know. Still, he remains one of the hobby's most effective and dangerous opponents and 1975A is not over yet.

Andy Phillips, perennial second of the "big three" in Calhamer points (Birsan, Phillips, and D. Beyerlein, resp.) has something of a reputation for stabs, but does so only when it improves his chances, certainly not capriciously like Birsan. He can be trusted to cooperate in draw situations and, all in all, plays much like Doug Beyerlein.

Len Lakofka (5 wins or so) is probably the hobby's most avid believer in written treaties. Once you have a treaty with him, he can usually (but hardly always) be trusted to keep it. You cannot, however, trust him not to use every dodge he can think of to get out of the provisions of the treaty he has just signed with you, if he believes it is to his interest to do so. As an example, he may sign a treaty forbidding him from attacking you himself, but that hardly prevents him from persuading someone else to do so for him, now does it?

Having now antagonized half the leading players in the hobby more or less equally, hopefully Edi will now forgive me for singling him out and we can hear outraged complaints from someone else.

GAMEMASTER: Steve Brooks, 4960B Ave C, Great Falls, Mont 59405

Fall 1902 orders are due in Great Falls on September 1.

GREAT FALLS: I have had a protest over my adjudications in the Spring 1902 moves. It is asked that the support given by the German army in Denmark ("1 Don S F Nwy-Swe") should be allowed to the English fleet in Norway even though the order did not specify "ENGLISH" fleet. Regretfully, I must turn down the protest. The example given in section IX.1 in the rule book is quite clear.

IN DEFENSE OF THE PURE OF HEART

by David Forte

In CLAW & FANG #56 Gary Behnen, my colleague in 1974HZ, confessed to a melancholia at seeing so many "pure of heart" type of players enter the hobby in recent years. I myself have been in postal Diplomacy for only two years, so it is hard for me to make comparisons. But it seems to me that the introduction of a more reliable and stable diplomatic class can only bring benefit and more enjoyment to this game.

Gary seems to be arguing, a la Macchiavelli, that a player who keeps agreements simply for the sake of maintaining his own word is foolish and ultimately irrational. Like Macchiavelli, Gary calls for a diplomacy which takes into account the weird ethical predilections of the honest Prince, and uses such naivete for one's own advantage.

Actually, Gary is still calling for a stab kind of diplomacy. He only recommends that if you must stab, make sure you completely annihilate your former friend. In modern arms lingo, he urges a first strike diplomatic strategy.

If in fact, the hobby has been inundated by types who generally keep their agreements, then it seems to me we are witnessing a healthy growth in the art of diplomacy, similar to that which occurred in Western Europe some centuries ago. The intrigues of the Italian City States were eventually replaced by the relatively stable diplomatic style of the eighteenth century. The Enlightenment had its wars, but generally, the Princes sought no wars of annihilation, and had a pretty good record of keeping their avowedly temporary alliances. If indeed we are getting some of these types in the hobby, it will make for a more rational kind of diplomacy. One will not be able to break agreements either willy-nilly, or even if his current self-interest requires it. A diplomat will have to plan and be bound by a more intelligent long-range appreciation of the personalities and forces on the board. Long range planning may make for some short term inconveniences (e.g. keeping an alliance with a stronger ally), but, like chess, it is more challenging and more interesting to look beyond the next move.

There is one final factor which leads me to conclude that the pure of hearts have made Diplomacy more interesting and rational. This has to do with one aspect of the hobby which is quite different from the real world of Metternich, Talleyrand, and Casterleagh. In the real world, there is only one history going on. A diplomat has one country and one lifetime to work with. He had better make it work. There is no other alternative. But in our hobby, we are playing not just for victory in the current game, but in the next game as well, and in the game following that. If keeping an alliance causes one to take second place, that is no loss. For it means that in the next game, other players will trust you enough to let you (perhaps) win and they take second. The stabber, no matter how well timed his thrust wins only for a while, and then he will never have an easy time of it again. I am told, in fact, that a number of the pioneer players of Diplomacy are having great difficulty staying in any game they play now beyond a few seasons because of the wild style they adopted early in their careers (the style that Gary yearns for so much). Of course, these types can drop out of the hobby for a while, become gamesmasters (earning prestige points), or try to get into games with new pure of heart players and sucker them in also.

Although being a pure of heart diplomatist may be more interesting, rational, and beneficial over the long term, there are still some disadvantages that must be faced. First, unless there are many others so motivated in the game, you may easily find yourself with no real trustworthy partner. Many get discouraged at this point and "do as the Romans do," usually unsuccessfully. Occasionally, if you are the only such player in a game, the others may be so busy cutting one another that they will let you win. But generally you need four or five of the pure of heart types in a game to practice this kind of diplomacy successfully. Second, the pure of heart type is liable to practice self-deception. It is very easy to pretend to see sinister moves on the part of a neighbor, and convince yourself that you were only launching a necessary pre-emptive strike. I have found myself falling into this trap occasionally. Thirdly, he is likely to be charged with a stab, if he makes any move which is unexpected or slightly different from what his neighbor thought he would do. He always has to prove his virginity.

However, despite these disadvantages, it still seems evident to me that a diplomacy founded on keeping one's agreements is a striking advance over what Gary says went before. One must make his agreements more thoughtfully, he must plan in a more long-range fashion, and he must be willing to take something less than a win, to be among the finishers and winners in the games to come.

GARY BEHNEN'S COUNTERPOINT TO JOHN TORREY'S REBUTTAL TO GARY BEHNEN'S ARTICLE

Although I have not misread or misinterpreted the rulebook, I have misrepresented it in my article. The fourth sentence, of the fifth paragraph on page 4 of CLAW & FANG #56 should be changed to read, "... clearly states that you are permitted to spread rumors, make and break alliances, etc." Mr. Torrey is absolutely correct in his interpretation of page 1 of the rulebook, and I stand corrected.

As far as the rest of Mr. Torrey's rebuttal in the last issue is concerned he more or less states that anyone that uses this rule is not only a bad player for telling an untruth, they are consequently "losers." That claim is absolutely ridiculous. I am confident that you can't win, or even share in a win if you don't tell at least one untruth. Also, you must breach an agreement (stab) if you plan to win the game, unless you are playing with the most gullible of players.

Lastly, I would like to thank Mr. Torrey for taking the time not only to read, but to respond to my article. His new category shall be used, but under it will fall players that constantly fail in achieving their goal. It will not include those that do what the rulebook permits.

(Will there next be: JOHN TORREY'S REPLY TO GARY BEHNEN'S COUNTERPOINT TO.....?)

SCORING IN DIPLOMACY

by David J. Reynolds

Most people in CLAW & FANG report themselves as having X wins and Y draws in Z years of playing. I don't know whether there is a points system in the higher reaches of the profession, but it seems to me high time such a system was introduced to CLAW & FANG. It is hardly fair that one man who has fought the good fight, and ended up a loser in 1915, has to count this less than someone who has emerged with a voted draw in 1905.

I don't think much of the one-winner concept. Even a horse gets credit for being second or third. There are always 3 or 4 people in at the end of a won game, and this provides room for a first, second, third concept, with say three, two, and one points. Drawn games could divide up the six points equally, or a penalty might be a good thing--let them divide four points. This would make for a more realistic game, because nations don't ordinarily try to crush other nations completely, and it would make for faster endings because somebody who judged it best to be satisfied with second-place would co-operate with the number-one to end the game.

Another, and even better, points system is readily available, in the table of centers held which is published at the end of every game. Just award each player one point for every center held at the end. This would allow somebody who has mostly ended up a loser with 10 or 12 centers to have a rightful ranking over someone else who has gone into draws or civil disorder early in his games. And it would allow the Fangmaster (blessings on his hoary head) to publish an annual table showing the points rating of every player, which would, among other things, improve the action on the Bourse. There's nothing like full disclosure.

Another system is readily available from the same table, and it would change the character of the game in the direction of realism. End, as before, when someone gets 18 centers, but credit each player with centers times years held. (i.e., add together his 3 centers for the first year, plus his 5 centers in the second year, plus....to the end of the game) No more voted draws, but in a stagnant game the GM would declare a draw, similar to a chess draw. This would place a premium on gathering a modest competency of centers, and then staying out of harm's way. Which is what nations do. There would, almost certainly, be less double-checking and a lot more, and a lot better, diplomacy, which again is more realistic. The increased emphasis on survival rather than aggression would--watch HIM put his FOOT in it--make the game more attractive to those of the feminine persuasion, bless their realistic little hearts.

VIENNA: The Emperor Minimus paced nervously back and forth in the royal throne room. "Haven't the spring battle results come in yet? It's already fall."

"I'm sorry, Your Majesty," replied General Havok, "but the homing turtle died and we had to train a new one."

The emperor sighed. "Homing turtles," he moaned.

"Ah! They are here now!" said the general as an aide handed him the reports. He opened them and read.

"Well?" asked Minimus.

General Havok gulped. "Well, for one thing, the empress led our fleet in Trieste against Venice."

"She what??? Were there any casualties?"

"It is reported that she raped 75% of the Italian soldiers stationed there."

"Oh my God!"

"She was last seen pursuing a band of monks up the side of the Alps."

"She always did like virgins. What else?"

"Well, it seems the Kaiser has ordered his army in Munich into the Tyrrhenian Sea."

The emperor snatched the reports from Havok's hands and read them himself.

"Mark my words," warned Minimus, "von Crowley is up to something. He's probably trying to take Tunis without the use of fleets. A typical German maneuver."

"We could have avoided all this if you'd have only taught the crown prince to duck," scolded the general.

"Or shot the little bugger myself," replied Minimus. He scrawled something on the back of one of the reports. "Here are my orders for the fall."

General Havok took them and left, shaking his head. "The emperor has been playing too much basketball without his helmet," he commented to Colonel Zandurz.

"But basketball players don't have to wear helmets."

THE DIPLOMAT'S OTHER TABLE

CRUNCHY HEALTH BREAD

by Chris Pike

In some recent correspondence with Fangmaster he asked me, "Have you ever considered doing an article for CLAW & FANG?"

Of course my answer was "no". "I still have too much trouble with the game, so what could I write about?" (Anyone who would try to build in Greece doesn't have all of the finer points of the game down pat yet, and I've tried. I'm entitled to make the occasional mistake aren't I?)

Then I got to thinking and said to myself, "why not?" (After all it is International Women's Year.) So here is a contribution for "The Diplomat's Other Table" section. It was in my dear sainted mother's recipe box. It has been published before, but I can't tell you where. I know it was published because it was on magazine paper taped to a filing card.

(While I've got the chance; Canadian Mensa SIG members beware: Fangmaster may be beginning to sound like Martha Warnes of MC<sup>2</sup>--"Please contribute". ((Martha is editor of the Canadian Mensa magazine -- MC<sup>2</sup>--and is constantly appealing to the membership for contributions to MC<sup>2</sup>)))

Now for the recipe for Crunchy Health Bread: This recipe makes four loaves (5 pounds) of close textured, deep-flavoured bread that freezes well.

The ingredients:

- 2 $\frac{1}{2}$  Cups scalded milk
- 1 Cup wheat germ
- 1 Cup rolled oats or other coarse dry cereal
- 1 $\frac{1}{2}$  Cups warm water (100° F)
- 2 Tbs dark brown sugar
- 2 envelopes dry yeast
- $\frac{1}{2}$  Cup blackstrap molasses, malt syrup, or honey
- $\frac{1}{2}$  Cup oil
- $\frac{1}{2}$  Cup sesame seed
- 4 tsp salt
- 3 Cups whole wheat flour
- 5 Cups unsifted all-purpose flour

Pour scalded milk over wheat germ and oats in a large mixing bowl. Stir and let cool to lukewarm. Meanwhile, dissolve yeast and dark brown sugar in warm water. To cooked cereal mixture add blackstrap, oil, seeds, salt, and dissolved yeast. Beat in whole wheat flour. Scrape and remove beaters. Work in enough all-purpose flour with wooden spoon, and then by hand, to form a dough. Knead on a floured board until smooth and elastic. Divide dough in four pieces and form into loaves. Drop into four oiled loaf pans, about 8 $\frac{1}{2}$  by 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ , and stand in pans of warm water. Cover and let rise for 1 to 1 $\frac{1}{2}$  hours. Bake at 375° for 20 minutes, reduce heat to 350° and bake for 20 minutes more. Remove from oven and cool.

(Fangmaster here! I tried out this recipe and we found it delicious. One suggestion--my loaf pans may be larger than Chris'; but the next time I will try dividing the dough into three loaves instead of four.

(I had originally intended to test all contributed recipes before I published them. This plan ended when David Weitz submitted his recipe for Liver Triomphe--C&F #54. All recipes that I and Helpmate put into CLAW & FANG have, of course, been made by us many times.)

PRESS

SCHLICKBERND:(21 July 1975)-- A SOMEWHAT SELF-INDULGENT NOTE: The following press is the conclusion to a series started in COSTAGUAMA, and is being finished here with the kind permission of the Fangmaster (who, of course, will regret it). I sincerely doubt if anyone cares about it besides me, but a brief synopsis: Appollyon and his sidekick, Wesley Watercloset, set off in search of the meaning of their lives. This quest took them to many places and finally to heaven itself. Inexplicably, God could not answer their question, but directed them to a small green door. How do I get myself out of this dilemma? The dateline tells all...

DEUS EX MACHINA (wherein Apollyon finds The Truth): ...the door swung open, creaking on its neglected hinges. A small, cluttered room greeted Apollyon and Watercloset. Clothes were scattered in profusion and reams of paper were stacked to the ceiling. A staccato tapping sound drew their attention to a thin young man bonding over a throbbing typewriter: Wire-rimmed glasses were perpetually sliding down his nose, and his moustache left something to be desired.

"Welcome, Apollyon, I have been expecting you for quite some time," said the man, never looking up from the typewriter, which he continued to peck at with his index fingers.

"But...how...that is...?"

"Surely you read the signs along the way? Knows all, sees all, and--with a liberal bribe--tells all." The corners of his mouth turned up slightly in a wry smile.

At last! At long last, thought Apollyon. With a voice breaking with excitement and anxiety, he uttered his question for what he hoped would be the final time. "I have traveled far and seen much in my quest--but no one has been able to tell me the meaning of my existence, the purpose of my life. Who are you, and can you give me that which I seek?" He ended on a rising and expectant note, his hands clenching unconsciously. The only sounds that rent the tension filled air was the man's incessant typing and Watercloset's deep base snore.

"I am the supreme being of this universe, for I am the Author, the Creator of all that surrounds you. You are my instrument; my Devil's Advocate. Through you I question, prod, probe...." "And me?" interrupted Watercloset.

"A feeble attempt at comedy relief--even we Gods blow it sometimes. Still, I am the power, I am the Light, the One, the Only..."

Used! Betrayed! A mere puppet! Apollyon soothed at the Author's blasphemy, emotions surging through his brain, his blood pounding in cadence with the Author's typewriter. He understood at last; his plots and machinations bared completely. A grim resolve took Apollyon: better death than living as cattle under this fiend. He drew his dagger and crept up on the still-ranting Author.

"...without me, there would be nothing, for the reality that you perceive stems from my mind." Still he did not stir from his typewriter. Without remorse or hesitation, Apollyon gripped the blade and raised it. For one moment it hung suspended in air, glittering with finality. Then it flashed downward, plunging deep between the Author's scapula, the vertebrae splintering audibly. He made no sound, but still his fingers twitched upon his ebony keyboard. A gigantic eraser appeared and literally rubbed out Watercloset, leaving only a black smear. Giant spears hurled themselves from a yawning abyss that opened in the walls and slashed ~~Appollyon~~ from the universe. At last, a perverted smile was wrung from the Author's lips, his eyes glazed, and his nerveless fingers slipped from the ke
